

The Descendants of the Colonists in LUCIENVILLE

Basavilbaso, Escrinia, and Villa Mantero,

a Century Later

Our study on the orientation and destiny of the first colonists in Argentina and their descendants is based on the following facts:

- Early beginning: The emigration from the Russian Empire to Argentina was a “whole family process.” Sometimes, up to three generations would arrive together. Other times, the Father would emigrate first and then send the “follow me” signal to the relatives waiting in the Old Country. In some cases, two families whose sons and daughters were already married, would decide to emigrate together, would land in Argentina in the same ship, and would later settle in the same Colony.
- The majority of the first generation were already married when they arrived to Argentina: However, usually their sons and daughters were still single and would later on marry with youngsters from the same Colony or from Basavilbaso. Distances in Argentina are huge and the “chacras” were far away from each other. Means of transportation and communications at the beginning of the 20th Century in Argentina were not very developed.
- Their culture: Their language was Yiddish; their food was Kosher; the Jewish festivities and traditions were observed; weddings were between Jewish people. In our study of five generations, no first generation marriage involved non-Jewish people.
- except for a lonely immigrant who used Yiddish to communicate with a Christian woman of German-Russian origin and married her.

As time went by, the descendants of the first colonists started to behave like their non-Jewish neighbors. This process was faster when the Colonists lived in Towns rather than in a Colony. The festivities and traditions were left behind; their faces were shaved, no more beards, no more head covers. Names were changed: Mindl was Manuela, Falck was Felipe. Latter the surname was “shortened”: Braiulovsky became Brailo and so on...

The national language, Spanish, started replacing Yiddish; they started eating the same foods as the local people; they started attending the same schools, clubs and parties, and Jews started marrying Christians:

"...Yes, it is true that she is a goye, but she can cook knishes better than the bobe..."

"...We started buying meat in the gentile butcher store when we noticed that it was much cheaper than the shoichet..."

After the fourth generation, we find not only mixed couples of Jews and Christians but also, for the first time, we see weddings of the grand-grand-children of the first Colonists were both of them are Christians.

This analysis here presented, was done using broad data from five families who settled in the Basavilbaso area, and three other families who settled in the South of Argentina in the areas of Colonia Russa, Phillipson and Rivera.

These eight families were researched for a period of one hundred and fifteen years of their lives. The information can be seen in the sections following this Prologue. There you will learn about:

- The first generation, i.e. the immigrants who were born in the Russian Empire and died in Basavilbaso and other colonies.
- Those who followed them, i.e. were born in the Colonies, were mostly married inside the Jewish people and a few with non-Jewish. Some of them died in the colonies, some in other towns.
- The following generation, mostly were born outside the Colonies, and marriages with non-Jewish people became more frequent.
- Finally, most recently, some of the descendants of the Colonists started emigrating from Argentina, most of them going to Israel.

...They shall be countless as the dust upon the earth, and you shall spread

Far and wide, to North, and South, to East and West..
